

The Secret Menu Index

Every tradition is an operating system. Around 1950 this one got a forced update: the methods kept, the frame stripped, the update notes never published. This page is the deletion log, recovered from the record. Companion to The Magick That Never Left. The Secret Menu restores the files: the full story of each entry, with practical exercises alongside. The exercises stay in the Menu. This is a map, not medical advice and not a list of treatments for sale.

祝由 (zhùyóu), ritual healing by charm and spell. What it was: a tested subject of the Yuan state medical academy, its own section on the official exam, beside acupuncture. The cut: filed out of medicine in the modern rebuild. Restored in the Menu: the full history, with exercise. Spiritual practice, not healthcare. Same fence as the needles.

十三鬼穴, the Thirteen Ghost Points. What it was: thirteen points, traditionally attributed to Sun Simiao, for what the tradition called ghost affliction. The cut: the points kept, the ghosts filed off. Restored in the book: the history, told straight. The needle work stays with trained hands; that line doesn't move.

禁經, Sun Simiao's Book of Spellbinding. What it was: talismans, incantations, exorcisms, demon-expelling points, bound into the same formulary as the 45-ingredient prescriptions. The cut: reclassified as an oddity, when it's read at all. Restored in the Menu: the history of the spellbinding material, with exercise.

符 (fú), talismans. What it was: not sigils, written orders. Celestial script, drawn under authority, addressed to spirits the way an official addresses a subordinate. A warrant, not a wish, with two thousand years of documented construction logic. The cut: filed under folk religion. Restored in the Menu: where they came from and how the tradition built them, with exercise.

Wǔ Yùn Liù Qì, the five movements and six qi. What it was: the tradition's own timing model, written into the medical classics themselves. The cut: demoted to elective. Restored in the Menu: the model and how it was used, with exercise.

Zǐ Wǔ Liú Zhù and Líng Guī Bā Fǎ, timing acupuncture. What it was: the calendar applied to the channels. The cut: survives in some streams, stripped of its cosmological frame. Restored in the book: the history and the frame. Clinical application stays clinical.

Bàzì, the birth chart. What it was: the chart under the intake form, constitution read before symptoms. The cut: gone from curriculum. Restored in the Menu: how the old doctors read it, with exercise. Practice, not healthcare.

Divination as pattern perception. What it was: the oracle read through the medical-cosmological frame, pattern-reading, not fortune-telling. The cut: carved out of medicine entirely. Restored in the Menu: the history of the method, with exercise.

Cultivation as the practitioner's floor. What it was: qigong, meditation, ritual hygiene as the daily core, the instrument before the formula. The cut: reduced to a course or two, a side hobby students get around to eventually. Restored in the Menu: what the daily practice actually was, with exercise.

The frame itself. What it was: the cosmology that held all of the above as one project. The cut: swapped for materialist language in 1950-something and called the original. Restored in the Menu: the cosmology as history, then loaded and run.

The free chapters tell the story of the deletion. The Secret Menu restores the files: each entry in full, with the practical exercises that go with it, plus the growing archive. The exercises are written the way I practice: load the frame, run it, log what happens, keep what works. $25 a month when it opens; a founding-year rate at launch. No specific results are promised; the log exists so you can judge the practice for yourself. Nothing in it is medical advice or a substitute for care, and the needle stays with trained hands. Subscribers hear first.

In Ontario, acupuncture is a regulated health service, delivered without supernatural claims and with no guaranteed results; divination, Reiki, Qigong, and ritual are separate, are not regulated health services, and are not offered to diagnose, treat, or cure any condition.